Keeping Financial Powder Dry To Fight Market Volatility

Wes Moss in the Atlanta Journal Constitution

With the primary indices all flirting with “correction territory,” it’s time for a market correction gut check.

As a reminder, a market correction is typically defined as any major stock index declining by more than 10% but less than 20% from its most recent peak. Once the drop hits 20% it can still be a correction, but it runs the risk of triggering a bear market.

As investors, we’re all staring at a long list of concerns — future COVID variants, geopolitical and economic unrest, and Vladimir Putin amassing a scary number of Russian soldiers along the Ukrainian border all come to mind. Furthermore, the second year of a presidential cycle is historically the most volatile. All of this adds up to what the market hates most of all — uncertainty.
